Technology in Education and Care

Impact of Technology on learning and practices – As professionals you are hearing about the impacts of blue light on children's developing brains, the lack of physical activity and sensory deprivation. We are now immersed in the age of technology. It's presence can be all consuming. How can we incorporate technology into our programs? What are the impacts on children's development and the learning programs in our settings?

Programming Autonomy

Achieving pedagogical autonomy in the face of external influences and challenges - As professional's you recognise the importance of providing programs that offer children real autonomy. You know that children learn best through play yet the push for school readiness translates into formal learning models being endorsed and enforced.

Intentional Environments

Environments are the third teacher and the impact of quality environments on the potential of learning programs requires careful consideration, planning and intent to ensure you have all the necessities for a great learning environment. Whether working in an adapted, shared community or purpose-built space there will be aspects of these spaces that pose a challenge to the program.

Nature based learning

Bush and forest learning programs have a growing following in education and care across the world and many practitioners in Australia are now embracing the outdoors to extend on their learning programs for children. For many practitioners, this has been welcomed with open arms while others feel conflicted even inhibited by formalised education thinking and policies.

Supporting positive transitions to school

As an Education and Care practitioner your role is to scaffolding children's learning and development through the provision of rich, nurturing and age appropriate learning programs. You need to have a sound knowledge of child development, be intentional and recognise those opportunities for learning. Knowing what and when to observe, support, extend or refer can have a significant impact on children's learning. As an education and care professional you have a responsibility to provide programs that will afford all children the best possible start to formal schooling and the push to include formalised learning experiences in your programs can be hard to deny.

Risk and resilience

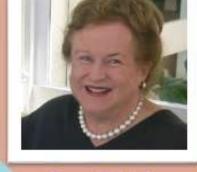

Research demonstrates how EC practitioners can provide optimal challenges for children during play; and how children can learn from failure, adapt to difficult circumstances and negotiate social squabbles, thereby building emotional stability and resilience. The early years of life are by far the most influential; with key motor, language and psychological skills developed before entry to primary school.

Each individual education and care practitioner's strengths, interests and challenges are as unique as the individual children they have been entrusted with and as unique as the service, community and sector in which they work. They are an Education and care practitioners and deserve to be recognised and represented as a professional in the field of Education and Care.

Just as the National Quality Standard (NQS) and Early Years Learning Framework (EYLF) have high expectations for children and see children as competent and capable, we at ECW have high expectations of our education and care professionals. Educators are highly skilled, passionate professionals whom we hold in high esteem, as do those within the community that know and understand the invaluable work they do caring for and educating our most vulnerable and valuable members of community.
